Additional notes about data:
- China does not present data for Number of Units for 2013
- The United States does not present data for Number of Units for 2013
- Brazil does not present data for Number of Units for 2013

Additional notes about extremes in variance:
- The spike in data from in 2013 from Ukraine is a result of currency devaluation, because of the region’s instability. With a lower value of the hryvnia, it became cheaper for other countries to import Ukraine’s goods, increasing the trade balance. Because weakened domestic currency would make purchasing foreign currency more costly, Ukraine solely focuses on exports.
- The drop in data from 2012-2013 from Mexico is a result of the manufacturing crisis, which decreased Mexico’s ability to produce goods. This crisis meant that it became harder to import goods, as well as harder to export to its neighbors. Therefore, with a crisis like this, companies chose not to import from Mexico, lowering Mexico’s export statistics.
- Additionally, Venezuela’s relationship with South Africa has resulted in increased use of South African equipment. Since 2008, ties between the two nations have grown deeper, as the countries’ leaders have signed several agreements on trade and currency swaps.
